. GERI'S PIXIES: "EMERGENCY RATIONS" (UK) 4ç(â€œ). MP3. 1 of 1. JOHANNESBURG (Reuters) - South African police fired teargas and water cannon on Monday at protesting students who attempted to block entrances to the University of KwaZulu-Natal (UKZN) in the capital Johannesburg, witnesses said. Students have been occupying the entrances to the university for the past seven days in protest against a security agreement between the university and the police force. In a statement, security minister Sicelo Mshane said the university had overstepped a legal cap on the number of officers it could deploy and had failed to provide security at the main entrances. "When the police arrived, the members of the student movement refused to leave the site, and a tense situation was created," Mshane said. The students were being allowed to leave the university and had no plans to return to the campus, he added. Police spokesman Albie Modise earlier told Reuters at least 50 students had been arrested. A third of all South African students attend the KwaZulu-Natal-based university, one of Africa's largest and a prestigious academic institution. There was no immediate comment from the university or the government on Monday. KZN's Bishop Mpho Tutu in an earlier statement had called on the students to withdraw from the university. "The actions of the students threaten not only themselves, but also the security and that of the entire nation and the university community at large," Tutu said. The students started their protest on March 7 at the main entrance to the university, which has been occupied for the past week. Hong Kong police on Sunday fired tear gas and rubber bullets at protesters occupying a major traffic artery in a standoff that threatens to further derail the city's tourism and retail industries. At least two dozen people were injured during the daylong standoff in Mong Kok, according to the Hospital Authority. Hundreds of black-clad protesters had chained themselves to traffic boxes by the intersection of Nathan Road and Tiu Keng Leng Road at around 12.30pm local time, with others rallying along the highway. Conventional connectors require the use of specific wire wraps, clips, or other components to prevent the wires from becoming twisted when being connected. Conventional connectors can employ solderless wire connections, however, these connections require the use of special tools for terminating the wires, or require the use of twisting tools for terminating the wires. Connector terminals are required to make reliable solderless connections. In the case of a conventional connector, the terminal has a portion which extends in a direction parallel to an electrical contact portion which is brought into engagement with a wire. The terminal has a plurality of grooves. Each groove is formed in a generally rectangular cross section. Grooves are arranged in parallel rows. The rows alternate in direction to form a plurality of apertures. The end of a wire is positioned against the terminal and pressure is applied to the end of the wire. The pressure applies forces to the wire against the grooves so that the wire is forced into each groove. The displacement of the wire into each groove, and the number and size of the grooves, determines the strain point applied to the wire. Thus, the wire can be taken to a strain point where it would not break during normal use. The strain point is also known as the strain limit. Conventional electrical connectors have been formed by heating the terminal for a time sufficient to set the plastic material. #include "stdafx.h" namespace llvm { namespace CodeGen { void registerFunctionAttributes(RecordKeeper
