In the oil and gas industry, a drilling rig is used to drill a well that may extend thousands of feet into the ground. During the drilling process, and in the event of an emergency, when it is needed to access a specific zone of the well, a probe must be lowered into the well to determine whether hydrocarbon is present in the zone. Typically, a probe is made up of a pressure recorder and a sonde, a water sensitive tool, suspended in a cylinder pipe. The sonde is coupled to the pressure recorder, which when it detects the presence of a hydrocarbon, provides a signal indicative of this detection to the surface of the well. The probe is lowered to the desired depth at which the hydrocarbon is suspected of being located, and the pressure recorder records pressures associated with this depth. Once the recorder reaches the desired depth, the probe is released to further descend into the well. After the recorder and sonde reach the desired depth, the probe is lowered a distance into the hole. With the sonde exposed to the hydrocarbon located within the well, the sonde detects the presence of the hydrocarbon and transmits a signal indicative of this detection to the surface. The probe is retrieved to the surface to be read by the operator of the drilling rig. Typically, the probe is released from the end of the wireline after the probe has detected the presence of the hydrocarbon. In those instances where the sonde is worn out
