Papers published by the New York State Trial Lawyers Association (NYSTLA) have refuted any reports of an Ob-Gyn shortage in New York State¹⁶. However, these studies have not taken into consideration those physicians who have reduced their scope of practice and are therefore limiting the supply of obstetric services available. NYSTLA also argues that New York State has nothing to worry about regarding retirement among Ob-Gyns, reporting that in some areas of the state, large proportions of the practicing ob-gyns are still relatively young (with about a third of Ob-Gyns having been in practice for between 10 and 20 years). However, according to a study conducted by the Center for Health Workforce Studies in 2006, between 2004 and 2005, more than 10% of all New York State Ob-Gyns reported plans to retire or reduce hours, a rate that is much higher than for all other specialties¹⁷. Ob-Gyns in New York also plan to retire at much higher rates in younger age groups (See Figure 3). Even though a large portion of practicing Ob-Gyns in New York State are in their forties, the average age at which physician's stop practicing obstetrics is 47 years old.¹⁸
